I have been very disappointed by the way the Microsoft settlement is being handled. The entire purpose of anti-trust cases to keep a single entity from welding to much power over the citizenry and to render "Equal Justice for All". A corporation should not be immune from having to obey the laws of the land, and when that corporation breaks those laws they should be punished in accordance to the laws they broke. If a corporation then proves that it has no intention of obeying laws it finds inconvenient to its business practices, that corporation should be dissolved.

I do not think that it is necessary at this time to dissolve MS. (Despite their apparent complete disdain for the judicial process, and willingness to perjure themselves.) However the ramifications of their misdeeds need to have some substance to them. They MUST not be allowed to continue to disregard the laws of the land. MS is swift and harsh with software pirates (including government agencies that exceed license counts) I see no reason that the judgment against them be any different.
